Membership Q&A: Nate Floyd

What is your current position, and what is your favorite aspect of your job?

I am a part-time journalism instructor in the Department of Media, Journalism, and Film at Miami University in Oxford, Ohio, where I teach journalism students the fundamentals of news reporting and writing. I also teach, mentor, and support first-year students as a full-time librarian at Miami University Libraries.

History Division Mentorship Program Call for Participants, Deadline Sept. 22

The AEJMC History Division is seeking participants for this year's mentorship program. Prior mentors and mentees have found the program highly beneficial, with many choosing to continue their relationships informally after their year has ended. If you're looking for help with your career, research, or teaching, sign up as a mentee.

Journalism History Seeks Essays on Civil Rights

The website for AEJMC History Division's scholarly journal, Journalism History, seeks essays on the history and importance of civil rights over the past 60 years. The impetus for this essay series is the 60th anniversary of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, but articles connecting more broadly to the media and civil rights will be accepted. One installment in the website's annual essay series will be posted on the Journalism History website each month throughout the year 2024. Three essays will be published in Journalism History. The winning essay will receive a $100 prize.

Essays should not have been published elsewhere.

To be considered for inclusion, please submit the following to jhistoryjournal@gmail.com by 11:59 p.m. Pacific time on Nov. 15, 2023:

- A brief CV (including publications)
- A brief synopsis of the topic you plan to discuss in your essay (no more than 100 words)

The schedule for publication will be decided by Dec. 15. Completed essays accepted for online publication will be due approximately two weeks before their scheduled publication date. The three essays to be published in the journal will be due by Feb. 15, 2024.

Completed essays will be 1,000-1,500 words, including citations. Authors should cite primary and/or secondary sources to support their arguments. Any citation style is acceptable for articles published on the website; Chicago Manual of Style (17th edition) must be used for essays accepted for publication in the journal.

Questions may be directed to Willie Tubbs, essay coordinator, wtubbs@uwf.edu.
